The brain's emotional centers, sometimes referred to as the amygdala, process the information, feelings, and memories associated with the event. This processing can lead to intense emotions, such as fear, anger, or joy. The emotional response can then trigger the body's stress response, which can affect physical health and well-being. The brain's emotional centers are continuous, and the information they process can influence how we perceive and respond to the world around us.